Dear Mill,

If you and Bertrude are still in conference over the question of whose turn it is to write me, I trust you will allow me to intervene—-at least, long enough to express my thanks for your note of May 15 with its enclosure.

Trouble with your whole turn system is that it is liable to have a restrictive effect on your freedom to write out-of-turn. Better it would be, it seems to me, if each of you would write whenever you were 'busting to tell something a loved some information you thought I, too, might like to have'. Moreover, if the one who is writing should receive from the other a stamped addressed envelope, that would tend to equalize the burden of writing to me.

If I were to hear you say "Thanks for the suggestions," I would reply "You're welcome and love to you both."

Ed 5/25/73
Dear Mil,

If you and Gertrude are still in conference over the question of whose turn it is to write me, I trust you will allow me to intervene --- at least, long enough to express my thanks for your note of May 15 with its enclosure.

Trouble with your whose-turn system is that it is liable to have a restrictive effect on your freedom to write out-of-turn. Better t’would be, it seems to me, if each of you would write whenever you were bursting to tell something or had some information you thought I, too, might like to have. Moreover, if the one who is writing should receive [over page] from the other a stamped addressed envelope, that would tend to equalize the burden of writing to me.

If I were to hear you say “Thanks for the suggestions,” I would reply “You’re welcome and love to you both.”

Ed 5/25/73