

the duties devolving upon us as it ~~did~~ ^{has} them?
Why will not the same education which our parents had enable us to perform honorably

Every person of a sane mind knows that in order for a person to discharge honorably the various duties which devolve upon him he must be educated on an equal scale with the society in which he is to mingle. The highest enjoyment of human happiness arises from a good education. In the youthful days of our parents if a person knew how to read write and had a slight knowledge of arithmetic it was thought sufficient for him to engage in any business as the people with whom ^{whom} ~~which~~ he associated had no better education than himself he saw no need of having any more and perhaps he performed the duties devolving upon as honorably and was as happy as though he had more. But now the world at large ^{has} ~~have~~ arisen from its ~~stupid~~ schools and academies have been established so that nearly all can obtain a good knowledge of the common branches of education especially in the United States and more especially in New England. But if a person had no better education now the business which would be necessary for him to perform he would be obliged to neglect on account of his education and whenever he mingles with society he is regarded as a mere machine turning whatever way the opinion of others may carry him.

Why will not the same education which our parents had enable us to perform honorably the duties devolving upon us as it has them?

Every person of a sane mind knows that in order for a person to discharge honourably the various duties which devolve upon him he must be educated on an equal scale with the society in which he is to mingle. The highest enjoyment of human happiness arises from a good education. In the youthful days of our parents if a person knew how to read write and had a slight knowledge of arithmetic it was thought sufficient for him to engage in any business as the people with whom he associated had no better education than himself he saw no need of having any more and perhaps he performed the duties devolving upon [him] as honourably and was as happy as though he had more. But now the world at large has arisen schools and academies have been established so that nearly all can obtain a good knowledge of the common branches of education especially in the United States and more especially in New England. But if a person had no better education now the business which would be necessary for him to perform he would be obliged to neglect on account of his education and whenever he mingles with society he is regarded as a mere machine turning whatever way the opinion of others may carry him.
